Subject: Intelligence Terminology, JIC 383 Series

1. A meeting of the Senior Team with representatives of the CIG will be held at 1400, Tuesday, 26 August to continue discussion of intelligence terminology.

2. At the conclusion of the last meeting with the CIG representatives, there were 5 terms remaining to be defined, current, basic, staff, departmental and national intelligence. It was agreed that no further action would be taken by the JIS/CIG committee until the pending IAB meeting to consider revision of some of these terms was held. The group agreed to accept any revised IAB definitions of current, basic or staff intelligence; and to consider further the definitions of national and departmental intelligence.

3. The final IAB definitions of current, basic and staff intelligence are attached.

4. The steering member, Lt. Col. Dickey, presents the attached definitions of departmental intelligence for consideration by the JIS/CIG committee.

SUBJECT: Definition of Intelligence Terms

1. I agree that we must either consider that departmental intelligence and staff intelligence are synonymous or we must develop two definitions which clearly distinguish the one from the other.
2. The definition given in your attached memorandum does neither one nor the other.
3. If we are to distinguish staff intelligence from departmental intelligence, I offer for ICAPS consideration the suggestion that staff intelligence is all intelligence used by a department in its plans and operations. In addition each department is called upon from time to time to produce intelligence for another department. It is called upon because the intelligence falls within its field of dominant interest. This intelligence is not used by the drafting department as staff intelligence. If drafted in the War Department, however, it would properly be called War Department intelligence or more broadly "departmental intelligence." Q.E.D. departmental intelligence includes staff intelligence plus special request intelligence.

SUBJECT: Definition of Intelligence Terms

At a Joint JIS-CIG meeting on 25 June 1947, I informed the meeting that the following definition, although not acceptable to me, would be submitted to CIG for its opinion:

Departmental Intelligence - The intelligence needed by a department or independent agency of the Federal Government, and the subordinate units thereof, to execute its mission and to discharge its lawful responsibilities.

I felt that this definition was not responsive to our use in inter-departmental meetings of the term in the sense that it referred to that intelligence allocated to a department from the basis of its predominant interest only. In addition, I felt that this definition was so closely akin to that of "staff intelligence" that to the ordinary layman no clear distinction could be made between the two.

Request your opinion on whether the above definition should be accepted.

I think that "staff"
and "departmental" should be synonymous with regard to the intelligence drafted by a department within its sphere of dominant interest

Comment #3
Concur in #2. except, I believe it would be difficult to clearly define in all instances the "exact" sphere of dominant interest, and would delete this qualification.
